How science exams might not add up

A-LEVEL science exams do not contain enough maths questions and those that are asked are often too easy, experts warn. Biology, chemistry and physics papers are failing to prepare teenagers to study these subjects at university or to work in related areas, according to the Science Community Representing Education group. It is calling for a review of the maths required and guidelines to regulate the way maths is assessed after analysing exams taken in 2010.
